Background

The investigation into Russian interference in the 2016 presidential election began in July 2016, when the FBI opened a counterintelligence investigation into possible collusion between the Trump campaign and Russia. In May 2017, the Justice Department appointed Robert Mueller as Special Counsel to oversee the investigation.

Mueller's team of investigators spent two years investigating Russian interference in the election. They interviewed hundreds of witnesses, subpoenaed thousands of documents, and analyzed millions of pieces of data. The report they produced is the culmination of their work.

Findings

The Mueller Report found that Russia did interfere in the 2016 presidential election. Russia used a variety of methods to interfere in the election, including hacking into the computer systems of the Democratic National Committee and the Clinton campaign, releasing stolen emails, and spreading disinformation on social media.

The report also found that the Trump campaign had contacts with Russian officials during the campaign. These contacts included meetings between Trump campaign officials and Russian officials, as well as communications between Trump campaign officials and Russian intermediaries.

However, the report did not find sufficient evidence to establish that the Trump campaign had conspired or coordinated with Russia to interfere in the election. The report states that "the investigation did not establish that members of the Trump Campaign conspired or coordinated with the Russian government in its election interference activities."
