A Gathering of Literary Visionaries

In the early 20th century, amidst the transformative upheavals of the literary world, a group of pioneering poets emerged from the vibrant London art scene, united by a shared vision to revolutionize the very essence of verse. Led by the enigmatic William Marr, this collective of literary rebels became known as the Poetry Group, a name that aptly encapsulated their audacious mission to bridge the gap between poetry and painting.

Driven by a fierce rejection of the prevailing literary norms, the Poetry Group sought to shatter conventional poetic structures and explore uncharted territories of expression. Their unwavering belief in the power of imagery, rhythm, and form led them to embrace a diverse range of influences, from the imagist movement to vorticism, creating a unique blend of modernism and tradition that would forever alter the course of British poetry.

At the heart of the Poetry Group lay William Marr, a painter and poet whose boundless imagination and unwavering determination served as the catalyst for the group's groundbreaking endeavors. Marr's passion for art
