Mary Lawson's Thousand Winds That Blow Wild Wind is a haunting and atmospheric novel that explores the themes of love, loss, and the power of nature. Set against the backdrop of the unforgiving Canadian wilderness, the novel follows the story of a young woman who is haunted by the death of her husband. As she struggles to come to terms with her grief, she finds solace in the beauty of the natural world and the wisdom of an enigmatic old woman.

The novel opens with the death of Robert, the young husband of Lawson's protagonist, Ginny. Ginny is devastated by Robert's death, and she is left alone to grieve in the isolated cabin that they shared. As the days turn into weeks and the weeks turn into months, Ginny's grief consumes her. She is unable to eat or sleep, and she begins to withdraw from the world.

One day, Ginny meets an old woman named Mona. Mona is a wise and compassionate woman, and she takes Ginny under her wing. Mona teaches Ginny about the power of nature and the importance of letting go. She also helps Ginny to connect with the spirit of Robert, who is always with her in the wind.

As Ginny begins to heal from her grief, she finds solace in the beauty of the natural world. She spends hours walking in the woods, listening to the wind, and watching the animals. She also finds comfort in the company of Mona, who is always there for her.

Thousand Winds That Blow Wild Wind is a beautifully written and deeply moving novel about love, loss, and the power of nature. Lawson's writing is lyrical and evocative, and she creates a vivid and atmospheric setting that draws the reader into the story. The novel's characters are complex and well-developed, and the reader is sure to feel a deep connection to Ginny and Mona.

Thousand Winds That Blow Wild Wind is a must-read for fans of literary fiction and nature writing. It is a haunting and atmospheric novel that will stay with the reader long after they have finished reading it.
